Protection of private, tax paying citizen property rights.

public will exerted on private property

Do not like restrictions on private property

Over reach by a neighborhood association on property rights

Maintain existing zoning and tree ordinance. I would vote no to making Ansley Park a Historic district. Ansley Park is eclectic, design guidelines and zoning could never be established.... focus energy on replanting on trees and crime prevention

I do want to preserve the rights of property owners to renovate their houses without excessive limitations and in some cases to be able to tear down existing insignificant homes if the new construction is in keeping with the character of Ansley Park

Ability to build pursuant to my own tastes

Some homes are architecturally insignificant or are energy inefficient and should not be subject to onerous restrictions as to how they may be demolished.

Neighbors who want the best of both worlds. High property values, but restrictions on what one can do with their property to much control of community

There seems to be a push for a restrictive landmark zoning regulation, which would make the neighborhood significantly less interesting, would stifle creativity, and would burden homeowners with additional costs and time-consuming regulatory processes.

I like the mix of old and new houses. I do not want to become a historic district and have individual residents interfering in the design of my house. Druid Hills is a nightmare we need to avoid.

Fear additional rules / regulations may hinder investment in the neighborhood. Its important to strike a good balance between protecting what is important but also allows reinvestment in the neighborhood including new homes when done appropriately.

This issue almost tore the neighborhood apart in the 90s. There are people standing by to oppose it again, and I'm afraid it will again turn unpleasant. Ansley needs to be a living neighborhood, not a historical relic.

I don't like money being spent for lawyers to fight things that will only make our neighborhood even prettier than it is.
